The Extraterrestrial Agenda

Scientists using several methods to determine the age of the universe have arrived at an age of about 11.2 to 20 billion years. A difference of 8.8 billion years!

Furthermore, most methods for determining the age of the universe are based on the governed speed of light and the fact that the universe seems to be expanding at a particular rate of speed. This expansion is thought to have begun with the event of a “Big Bang.” The subject of the Big Bang will be reviewed in a later part of this writing along with the subject of “Intelligent Design.” If it is true that light is not subject to time or distance between solar systems (solar lenses) then these age determinations might not be accurate and the universe might be very much younger (?).

The scientists also believe that the Earth was formed and took orbit around the sun some 4.55 billion years ago. (+/- 1%).

These determinations of age do permit one to postulate that there might be intelligent extraterrestrial cultures existing in the universe that are millions or even hundreds of millions years old. One could even stretch this possibly to a billion years or more.

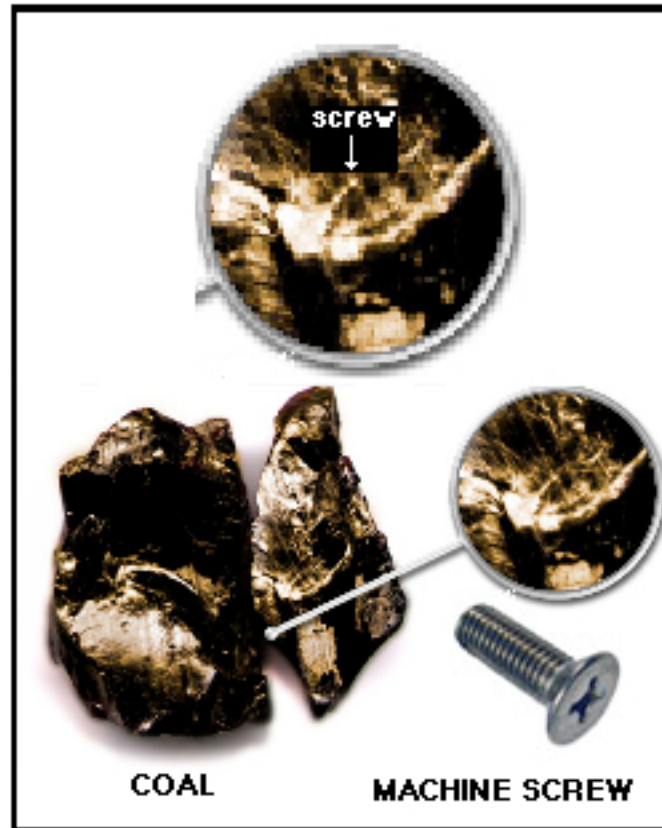

We depend on the fossil record and the theory of evolution to inform us of what type of life existed on the Earth in the past and how it evolved to what it is today. These criterion are not dependable when certain finds are not accurately reported in order not to discredit a long line of theories laid down by respected scholars.

Dr. Louis Leakey once classified his find in the Oldavi Gorge in Africa of an early human as being 200 million years old. Peer pressure caused him to adjust his dating to conform to the prevailing theories. Dr. Leakey's first dating of 200 million years for his human remains would have indicated that humans existed at least 135 million years before the last of the dinosaurs died off, some 65 million years ago.

When machine screws are found in anthracite coal deposits hundreds of million years old, and gold chains are found in chalk beds in England and France that are just as old as the coal deposits mentioned above, then it is certainly time that we take another look at our ancient past, without letting those with special interests tell us what to think.

Coal is a fossil fuel found in deposits of sedimentary rock. Coal is produced from the remains of ancient plants, club mosses, horsetails, seed ferns and conifers, that lived in swampy areas as long as 400 million years ago.

There are many discovered artifacts that point to the fact that intelligent life existed prior to 200 million years ago or more. I recall reports of human footprints made by a person wearing manufactured shoes in strata many millions of years old, machined spheres found in a coal mine in Hungary and in strata 300 million years old in Africa. I also recall that a human femur belonging to an 8 foot tall man was found in lava strata dated as being 6 million years of age. This period (of unknown length) from which these baffling artifacts originated will be referred to by me, as the “Time of Sorrows.”

Above is the famous picture of the “Taylor Trail” in Glen Rose, Texas, showing human footprints next to those of a dinosaur.

A fossil of a human hand print was found in limestone estimated to be 110 million years old.

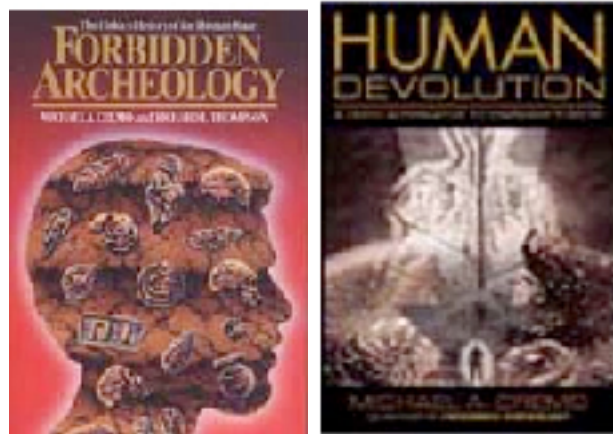

A number of metallic tubes were dug out of 65-million-year old Cretaceous chalk in France.

In recent years these forms of evidence have been gathered and studied by a number of researchers. A book that stimulated considerable research in this area is called “Forbidden Archeology” by Michael A. Cremo and Richard L. Thompson.

Eventually many researchers came to the most logical reason for why these artifacts were found in very ancient strata: “Devolution.”

A person could be better informed about the mountain of discovered evidence that pertains to the subject of Devolution by obtaining the following books.

For more than 40 years we have studied the UFO and extraterrestrial visitations to Earth with the knowledge that human habitation existed on this planet hundreds of millions of years ago.

With this in mind, it became obvious that something occurred that caused those ancient humans and every other living thing to begin to “devolve.” And during the period of devolution much of the evidence for the existence of these very ancient people became erased by millions upon millions of geological events. Then at some point several million years ago the devolution process stopped, reversed and reevolution began, and has continued on to the present day.

The process of reevolution has been misidentified as being the evolutionary process that was introduced to us by Charles Darwin in his book the “Origin of the Species.”

The question of course is: What physically happened to the Earth that caused the most ancient of humans to devolve, so many years ago and then begin to reevolve?

The answer to this question is in the description of an unnatural phenomenon called the “Frequency Barrier.”

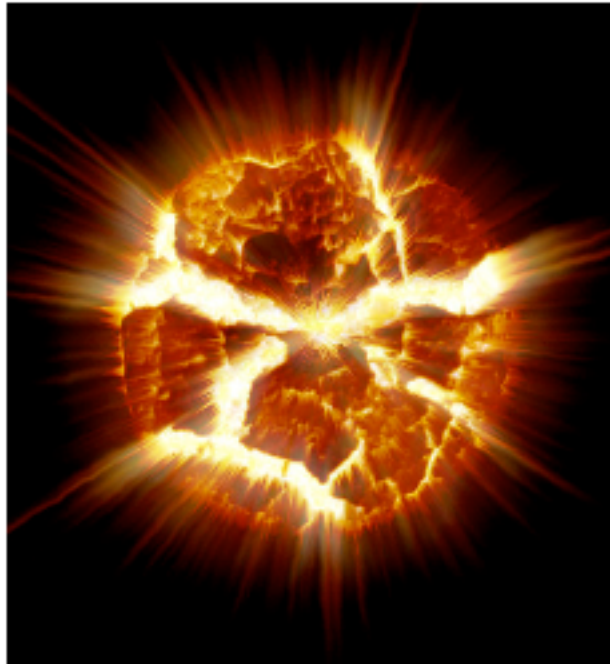

The Frequency Barrier

Prior to the event that created the frequency barrier in our solar system and particularly on the Earth, most of the planetary bodies were occupied by humans and other life forms.

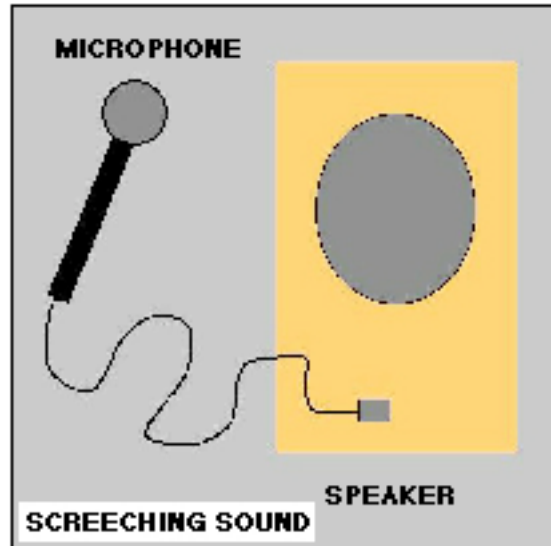

At least one planet of the solar system had spacecraft capable of traveling about the system. As well, space faring races from other solar systems were visiting and associating with several local planetary cultures.

The effects of the frequency barrier began about 80 years after a tremendous wave of a unique form of energy was transmitted from the Earth to the fifth planet of the system causing it to explode. This was not an act of war, but it was a very stupid accident.

When this energy was sent between the planets, it was not considered to be a moral act. It in fact was done because of greed on the part of those who’s planet was destroyed.

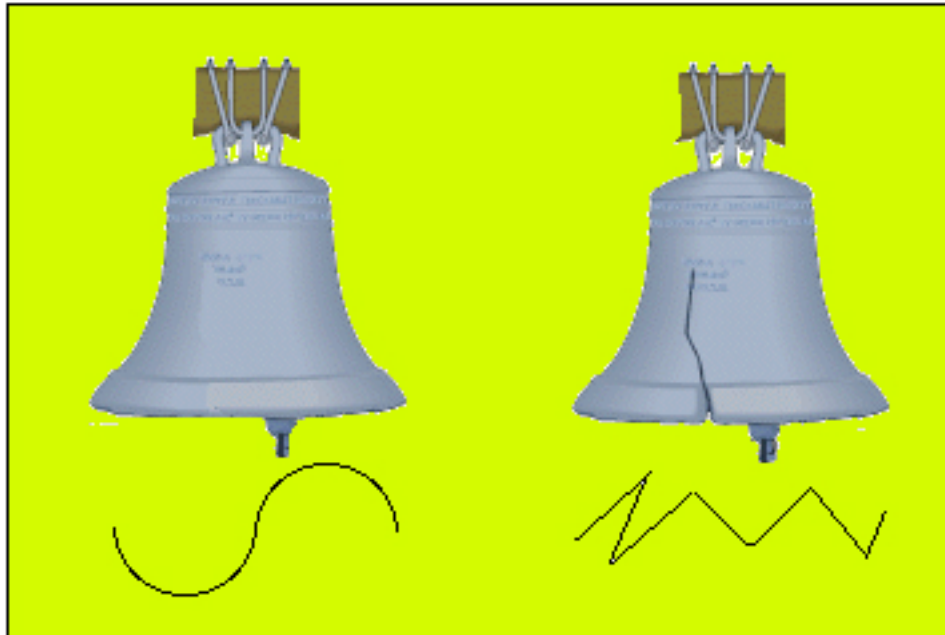

The energy sent to the planet caused it to vibrate and shatter, very much like a champagne glass will shatter when it's subjected to a sustained and sympathetic sound or musical note.

Because the energy originated from the Earth it “fed back” to the Earth. The feed back is similar to the feed back that is witnessed when a live microphone is placed near a speaker.

Most people have experienced that screeching sound.

The fed back energy caused certain key strata layers within the planet to crack, and the core of the planet began to oscillate radically. Random vibrations from the planet’s core caused the planet to ring like a “cracked bell.”

A study conducted at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology concluded that earthquakes can add energy to the Earth's molten core. So, a set of severe earthquakes could cause the core to vibrate up to 10,000 years. The study added that subsequent earthquakes in some cases dampen the vibrations in the core. The extraterrestrials are very interested in these core vibrations because they are the root of the Frequency Barrier.

Human cultures from outside the solar system began to help in the evacuation of people from such worlds as Mars and Venus. Their worlds were being pelted by fragments of the exploded planet and life was becoming physically unbearable.

The cratered surface of the Earth's moon bares evidence of this kind of fragmentation bombardment.

“Larger pieces of the destroyed planet now circle the sun in orbits that exist between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter in what is called the asteroid belt.”

ASTEROIDS

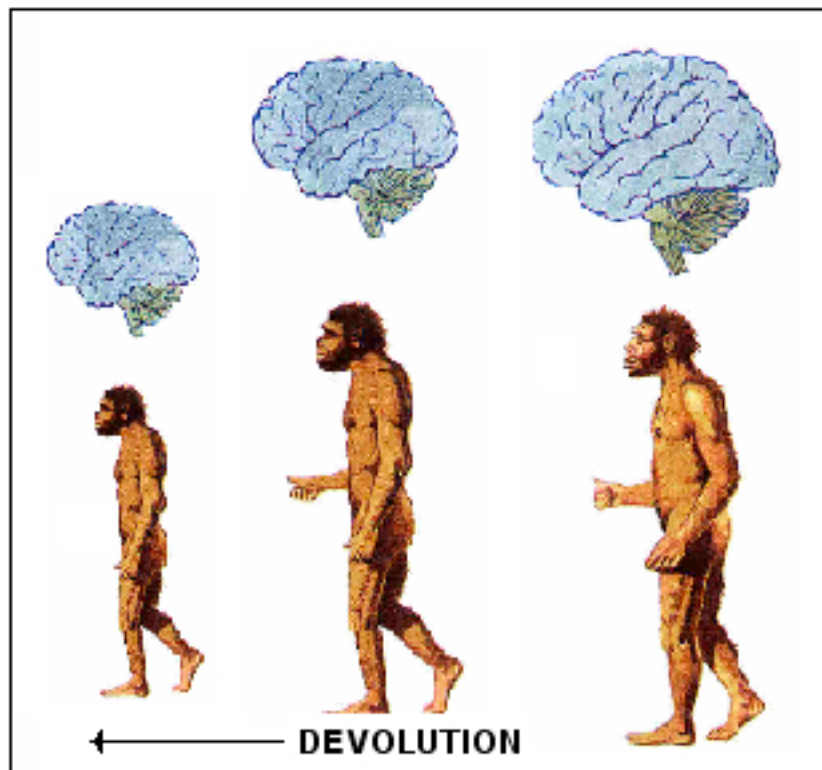

Asteroid Belt

Asteroids that cross the orbit of Earth are called “Apollo” asteroids. Those that cross the orbit of Mars have been named the “Amore” asteroids. Those that cross the orbit of Jupiter are called the “Trojan” asteroids.

Most of the human cultures of the “Sol” solar system abandoned their worlds and allowed themselves to be moved to the Earth. This was done over a period of about 80 Earth years.

Then strange things began to happen on the Earth. People began to lose their extra mental abilities. Soon those mental abilities that we of this day would think common place, began to fade. With the diminishment of brain functions the brains of successive generations began to get smaller and smaller.

The frequency barrier limits a person from using higher mental frequencies; and therefore limits their ability to think and reason.

As time went on (over thousands of years), those that survived very harsh conditions - such as floods, massive earthquakes, volcanic eruption, and extreme weather conditions were biologically reduced to 3 1/2 foot hairy creatures that lived in trees and in caves. They survived only by animalistic instincts.

Meanwhile, people of worlds outside this solar system sadly looked on, helplessly. Some soon began to avoid the solar system all together, but not all.

Prior to the beginning of the detrimental effects of the Frequency Barrier, DNA , and samples of plant and animal life were taken from Earth, and from other planets of the solar system. This later proved to be a very good thing.

The extraterrestrials realized that if they became physically exposed to the Frequency Barrier, they too were affected by it. Their mental abilities also became extremely dulled and they experienced biological changes such as hormonal unbalance. Prolonged exposure to the Frequency Barrier for them resulted in a horrible death. This is still somewhat the case today.

The extraterrestrials could do nothing about the Frequency Barrier (then or now) as far as the entire planet was concerned. But their highly technical abilities did permit them to produce and maintain a Frequency Barrier free environment within their spacecraft for a short period of time. As time went on they improved this technology and even applied it to enclosed areas under the planet's surface.

Near these underground bases they established preserves, and populated them with groups of humans that were in the process of devolving. Their benign motive was to save the various races from total extinction. Removing these people from the effects of the Frequency Barrier was fatal. Their brain functions could not tolerate what is called the "open unrestricted mental state."

Additionally it was realized that in the light of their native sun, they were much better off.

The preserves in which the devolving humans resided were isolated on remote islands in order to protect them from animals that had devolved into very dangerous creatures: such as the dinosaurs. The inhabitants of the preserves were fed with “air-drops” similar to the way the wandering Hebrews of the bible were fed with “manna.”

Present theories propose that dinosaurs evolved into birds. Whereas, according to the devolution/reevolution picture, birds devolved into dinosaurs and then the dinosaurs reevolved back into birds.

The picture below depicts a fossil of a creature (dino-bird) that is called Archaeopteryx, which is believed to have lived some 150 million years ago. Because it features a reptilian body and feathered wings, I ask . . . was this creature the product of evolution or reevolution? Was the species in the process of mutating from a bird to a dinosaur or dinosaur to bird?

At one point, the extraterrestrials recognized that the populations of the preserves began to increase in number considerably, and that they had begun to bury their dead, instead of eating them. Dinosaurs, as we know them, began to die out (or reevolve) and the rest of the world became less dangerous for humans.

At some point, the extraterrestrials moved the reevolving people from the preserves and spread them out across the globe to naturally fend for themselves.

It was at this point that the reevolution of the humans on Earth became a scientific interest. The reevolving of humans and other life on Earth sparked a special spiritual interest in a very large group of extraterrestrials, as well.

The extraterrestrials realized that the Frequency Barrier was the product of the vibrating core of the Earth, and that the detrimental vibrations were further enhanced when they passed through the cracks in certain key strata layers.

From the time they realized this, they began to monitor earthquakes and volcanic eruptions. Much much later: nuclear bomb detonations. They also began to repopulate the world with animal and plant life that went extinct on the planet during both the devolution or the reevolution periods. Many species could not negotiate the reevolution process. Some human types split off from the direct reevolutionary line and established what we call the Simians such as orangutans, monkeys, gorillas and chimpanzees. The “Missing Link” is us.

The Simians shown in the pictures above were chosen for the human like expressions on their faces.

All of the members of the various Simian species did not leave the path of re-evolution at the same time.

It is believed that the chimpanzee was probably the last to do so. Scientific authorities have recently written that they believe that chimpanzees and humans could have mated with each other and produced off spring as recently as 6.5 million years ago.

Recently, in an effort to explain how the brains of our ancestors grew to its present size and rose to produce art, writing, music and seek the answers to why we exist - a popular author suggests that primitive humans began to ingest hallucinogenic plants which expanded their consciousness.

With no disrespect intended, those of our research group call this suggestion the “Junky Monkey Theory.” It will be described further on that this suggestion is quite valid, but is possible only due to what we call “Frequency Barrier permission.”

A legend of the Aztec people of ancient Mexico says: “In the distant past the god Humac became angry and turned men into monkeys.”

There were times throughout history when the Frequency Barrier temporarily suspended its detrimental effects and the Earth experienced several “Golden Ages.” Each of these ages lasted at least several thousand years and then the Frequency Barrier became suddenly reactivated. During these Golden Ages civilizations flourish on the Earth. Many times, these civilizations had cooperative physical contact with the visiting Extraterrestrials. With the return of the Frequency Barrier the Extraterrestrials had no option, but to retreat from physical contact and resume their previous type of observations of the planet Earth.

EVIDENCE OF EXTRATERRESTRIAL RESEEDING

Coelacanth

The original discovery of the Coelacanth in 1938 is still considered to be the zoological find of the century. This “living fossil” comes from a lineage of fishes that was thought to have been extinct since the time of the dinosaurs.

Coelacanths are known from the fossil record dating back over 360 million years, with a peak in abundance about 240 million years ago. Before 1938 they were believed to have become extinct approximately 70 million years ago, after mysteriously disappearing from the fossil record. How could the Coelacanth disappear for over 70 million years and then turn up alive and well in the twentieth century?

These fish were thought to have been extinct for 70 million years (they think dinosaurs died out 65 million years ago!).

In the 70 million years that it is said to have been extinct, it has not changed or evolved at all!

The answer to this riddle is: At a time prior to the beginning of the devolution period this specimen was preserved off of the Earth either in a DNA bank or by some other means. Then at a time they deemed appropriate the extraterrestrial returned this species to the oceans of the Earth.

In Wollemi National Park (in the Blue Mountains) the New South Wales National Parks and Wildlife Services has found a pine tree once thought to be extinct. They are close relations to plants only found in the so called "Jurassic and Cretaceous" periods. (65-200 million years ago). There are very few of these trees left in an isolated area.

These are not survivors. They have been reintroduced to the Earth. Trunk rings should tell us when the extraterrestrials actually planted them.

Ivory Billed Woodpecker

The Ivory Billed Woodpecker was not spotted for more than 60 years. Then in 2005 they began to appear in numbers. These birds only have a life span of about 15 years.

It has been reported that between 2,000 to 10,000 new species (never known to science) have been discovered in the Great Smoky National Park. New species (of some number) were also found in the Rocky Mountains.

From Asia, Australia and the South American rain forrest come similar reports of new species and discoveries of plants and animals that have long been thought of as being extinct.

Rajah Gaz

In Northern India there exists a new elephant which is over 14 feet tall. The animal which is called Rajah Gaz has two remarkable bulges for a forehead. DNA acquired from its droppings show that it is the descendant of a South African elephant that became extinct 2 million years ago.

Pygmy Elephants of Borneo

After considerable, study scientists have concluded that the exceptionally small elephants of Borneo were not the product of humans controlling their breeding, but were in fact an entirely new species.

New Monkey

A new genus of monkey was found in Tanzania in 2005. It is called the “kipunji.” This creature measures about 3 feet in height, and lives in the Tanzanian highlands. DNA studies firmly established the fact that this monkey had never been scientifically cataloged before.

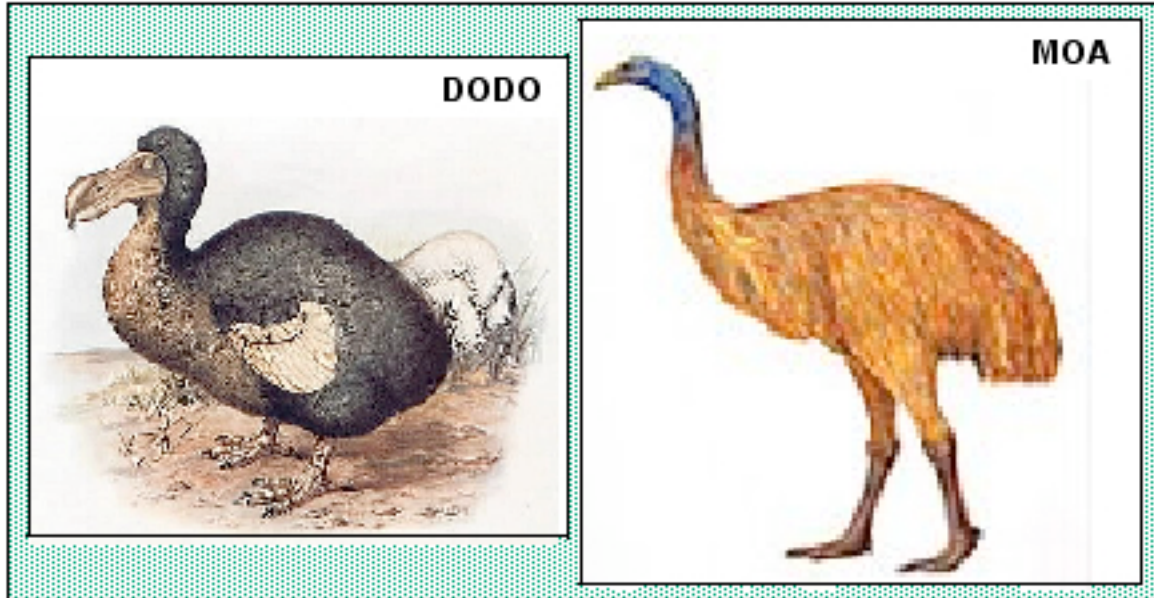

The type of shrimp (above) is believed to have been extinct for 60 million years, but was discovered in the Coral Sea in 2006.

The squirrel like rodent shown above was first thought to be a “new species.” It is called a “ laonastes” and has been recently identified as a member of the diatomyidae family of rodents that lived during the middle Tertiary period (34 million to 11 million years ago). These reappearances of extinct animals is being called by scientists the products of the “Lazarus Effect.” In some 11 million years the only sign of “evolution” in the animal above, seems to be that two of its teeth are a little more pointed.

Personally, I expect to learn that extinct birds such as the Dodo (Madagascar) and the Giant Moa (New Zealand) were discovered and doing well in New York City's Central Park!

From time to time discoveries of new species of animal, plant, insects and bacteria get reported. At this point the reader will be able to put these discoveries in their true category of reality.

Part 5, will deal with the subject of animal reactions to earthquakes and the frequency barrier. The Golden Ages will be addressed in more detail.

In Part 6 the extraterrestrials of this day and those of ancient times will be described in the light of our present knowledge.
